to pay for them to spend the night in a nice hotel.

Going on this journey has brought them closer together as a couple. Josh and Kerri aren't married -- yet! According to Josh he had some real concerns when Kerri said she wanted to come with him last year. As committed Christians, how would it look for a young, unmarried couple to be traveling across country, sleeping in a tent? "I was iffy about it at first," Josh said, "but with a lot of prayer and counsel, and the incredible experiences we've had, it just couldn't have been any other way." With a commitment to God, each other and good accountability partners back home, they have remained faithful to their Christian commitments.

Touching lives is what the walk across America is all about. Josh and Kerri shared one story about a man they met, who walked with them for three days. He was a really a hard man, but they ministered to him the whole time. He called them recently to say that he had continued to go to church and had made it a priority in his life. According to Josh, "Seeing the change in people through the hope that the Gospel brings into people's lives is what this trip is all about."

Josh and Kerri are not trying to raise money for anything. However if people would like to help them along the way, they do accept donations on the web site for necessities on their walk. You can follow their journey, watch the video blog, find out more about their trip or make a donation at joshwalksamera.com.

MAUDE SAYS:

Marriage is just a fancy word for adopting an overgrown man who can't take care of himself.

Maude says she has OCD, but she only cleans things when she is in the mood, because she is also bipolar.

Maude always wished that one of her personalities liked to clean the house. But then the other personalities got together and were going to "bump her off", of course they would make it look like an accident. It scared her so much, she gave up cleaning.

Did you ever do something permanently stupid, just because you were temporarily irritated?
